1. A Winter Breeze

I click my boot onto the ski, the ominous sound echoing. I don't know why I let my best friend talk me into this skiing nonsense. I'm definitely a bigger fan of sledding. Being close to the ground on a sled seems much safer than standing upright on two skinny skis.

"You're going to have fun, Amira," Melanie jostles my shoulder, and my skis start a slow slide away from each other. "Whoops!" She grabs me while I get my feet back into position next to each other.

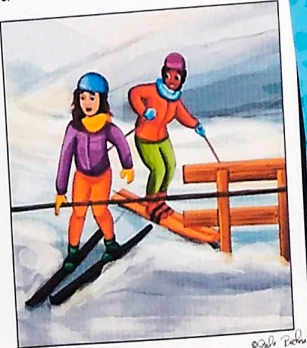

"Will it be fun to have a mouthful of snow when I fall?" I ask.

"You won't have a mouthful of snow," Melanie says. "Not if you have your ski mask on." I want to stomp away from her, but I don't have the balance or control to do so. I'm like a newborn deer on slippery ice.

"Let's head up," Melanie points to a rope contraption that's dragging people up a small hill. I say small hill, but it looks like a ginormous mountain to me. I'm not looking forward to going up it or going down it.

Melanie instructs me to grab the rope, but I let a few feet of length pass before I work up the courage to wrap my gloved hands around it. As soon as I do, I'm yanked forward. I'm okay for a bit, but then the upper half of my body gets too far ahead of my ski-clad feet, and yep, you guessed it.

My eyes are squeezed shut as I fall. I see the snow. I see the faces of other skiers holding the rope, and I feel my body rolling to the side but getting to the bottom. My skis are tangled, my face is wet, and my hands are buried in many inches of packed snow.

Arctic Fox Versus Red Fox

The arctic fox and red fox are two types of foxes on Earth. They have small furry bodies, bushy tails, triangular ears, and narrow snouts. They are expert hunters and omnivores. They feed on small mammals, birds, and eggs. They will also eat insects, fish, and crabs. Worms, reptiles, vegetables, fruit, and seeds are also on the menu.

While these two foxes are similar, they also have some differences. The biggest ones are appearance and habitat. Red foxes are larger than arctic foxes. They can grow to 14-20 inches tall. They weigh 10-30 pounds. Arctic foxes are smaller at 10-12 inches tall. They weigh 8-15 pounds.

Red foxes have red coats with white undersides and black patches on the ears and tail. Arctic foxes have all-white fur. This allows them to blend in with snow and hide from predators. Deserts, grasslands, and plains are all habitats for red foxes. Arctic foxes live only in cold environments with lots of snowfall.

These foxes share many characteristics, but each type has its own features as well.
